The Stages of Grief

While each person grieves in their own way, many people experience common stages of grief when they lose a loved one. Natural parts of the grieving process include:

Denial

Accepting the death of a friend is one of the most difficult things a person must do. That's why we may deny the death at first, and tell ourselves it can't be true.

Anger

As the reality of death settles in, anger often comes next. Before accepting our loss, we may direct our anger at those around us – friends, family members, caregivers and others. It's not uncommon for people dealing with such feelings to say or do things they don't mean.

Others may experience anger by turning inward. We may feel that there was more we could have done to help our loved one, and become overwhelmed with feelings of guilt. This is most often untrue, and in the end serves only to make it more difficult for us to cope with our loss.

Sadness

Sadness is frequently the longest part of the grieving process – the stage in which we feel emptiness in the face of life without our friend. For some, the mourning that accompanies this stage can become depression that affects all aspects of life.

Sadness is often addressed best through the love and support of those around us, and by working through our grief rather than locking it away. Counseling can also aid in moving from dwelling on our sorrow to resolving it.

Acceptance

The final stage of grieving allows us to continue on with our lives. While we wish our loved one was still with us, we accept their death. At the same time, we can now look back fondly on our experiences with our friend, remembering the good times and the pleasure of our pet's company.
